From 'The Little Kingdom' by Emyr Humphreys

SEVEN o'clock in the morning. Standing on top of the old lime kiln, Richard Bloyd glanced at his wrist-watch, held it close to his ear, and then plunged his hands once more deep into his overcoat pockets. It was a fine morning, but still chilly. Across the water he saw the Wirral emerge from the early morning mist; become once more a solid and substantial rich-green sea-girt land, speckled with red-roofed houses. The tide was out and down the estuary the mud flats gleamed in the oblique rays of the sun like the backs of enormous slugs resting in the low water. Down below on the water's edge the colliery's gaunt cranes emerged from a pall of mist and smoke, in its small harbour a dirty steamer blew its fog-horn into the silence, and after the silence was broken the day awoke. A train raced urgently across the coastal plain, as though all consideration was over, all decisions made, and the execution of plans begun.

He turned and walked briskly down the slope to his car parked below on the roadside, on the left side the fat rubber tyres wiped clean by the wet grass. He stubbed the self-starter with a broad, strong finger and the car moved forward smoothly down the road.
