From 'The Man Who Went Into The West : The Life of R. S. Thomas' by Byron Rogers

SARN RHIW

The house is built into a wooded hillside, the contours of which it follows so completely it could be a natural feature in the land until you notice a building there among the stones and the trees. Only this is a building out of recorded time, this is neolithic, the boulders in its walls four feet wide, three feet thick, some of them, estimated Thomas, weighing a ton. How it ever got built what species of mankind was able to lift the stones into place, is a mystery.

With one bedroom, reached by ladder, one hall 'with a huge stone hearth and enormous chimney rising up which most effectively takes all the heat of the fire up to the heavens', as John Mowat drily put it, and one kitchen, the house is small, hunched and huge at the same time, a dwelling for trolls. However many old cottages you have seen, you will have seen nothing like this. Imagine a long barrow from which someone had managed to scrape away the earth, throw out the dead, then fit tiny windows and a door, and you have Sarn. Outside it is a ruined pig pen and a goose pen.
